Building Systems

Monument signs (low signs near the road or driveway) provide an upscale method of identifying a storage property. The added landscaping around the sign adds curb appeal.

This storage business is co-located with the owner's home building business. The storage business is behind the office.

Using the same materials on both the building and monument sign is an effective method of tying them together visually.

This sign was designed in the unique shape of the logo.

This site carries the same branding as the property shown above, with the name modified to reflect the location. Renters choose a facility based on location, so including a geographic cue in the name is a good idea.

This sign is built from the same brick as the office, and illuminated with a sign lamp. If you expect to construct a lighted sign now or in the future, it's important to run conduit to the location before paving.

Each unit should be numbered. Contact a sign company to purchase stick on numbers - they are most commonly computer cut from 3M Scotch material. The numbers shown are 2" tall numbers placed on the header. Headers are less likely to be damaged by clients, so placement here reduces the chance that you will need to replace the numbers during a repair.

This property uses taller numbers on the door jambs next to each latch for better visibility.

The perimeter fence also provides a convenient location for mounting a sign.
